Gentlemen:

I have an IRA broker account with TD Ameritrade. I trade options in my account and would like to continue. I understand that the government would like to bank option trading in IRA accounts and I am against this. I do not disagree that some IRA holders are too aggressive, but the question is not who is aggressive, but who can financially handle the risk.

Rather than a blanket removal of option trading from IRA accounts, a better way might thru rules that would protect the IRA accounts. Among the choices are: Only accredited investors are allowed to trade options or all option trading require 100% coverage of puts and covered calls are okay.

Please re-look at this again and respect IRA holders who are financially strong and understand the risks of their actions. Don't "baby" the financially savvy investors, who often have professional advisors.

thank you.
